Short-sightedness (myopia) usually occurs when the eyes grow slightly too long, which means they're unable to produce a clear image of objects in the distance. It's not clear exactly why this happens, but it's thought to be the result of a combination of genetic and environmental factors that disrupt the normal development of the eye.

The first thing to understand when trying to evaluate if your child is too short is to learn a bit about height and growth work. Children grow at different rates and have growth spurts at different times. These “growth spurts” can result in a major discrepancy in height between two peers of the same age.

I don't want them to be quite hotpants (though I can support hotpants, too, in the right context), not so short that the bum is actually showing (though this can look great in an image, usually it never works for me in real life, no matter how good a figure someone has, only in a swimwear context), but just a TEENY bit longer than that. Just long enough to show maximum leg without showing ...
